Tape Series

Love in the time of quarantine is a glow in the dark tape painting on plexiglass that illustrates two figures communicating their ideas, love, and power from a distance. Between them their powers meet and form a Venn diagram.

During this unprecedented time, proximity to our loved ones and subsequently our modes of communication have shifted in substantial ways. "Love in the time of Quarantine" celebrates the love warriors out there, striving to sustain connection in these events-shifting times.

This tape painting glows in the dark and when the lights go out the powers flow in one direction, rather than two, changing the meaning.

This superhero painting created towards the beginning of quarantine illustrates an empowered vision of protecting oneself and propelling away negativity, fear, and germs. Now that we're nearing the end of this covid chapter, "Social Distancing" reminds me of the strength and resilience that it's taken to push through the past year.

NEWLY RELEASED

This FACE IT painting of Rachel Cargle, public academic, writer, lecturer, and activist, shows Rachel's strength and care in the revolution and the fight for racial justice.

The symbolism for this painting was inspired by the viral photo of Rachel Cargle with a raised fist from the 2017 Women's March. In "Rest and Revolution", Rachel is depicted with her raised fist and her other hand over her heart. The color that flows from each hand illustrates the strength and the self-care that flows from her to inspire the world.

This diptych explores the struggle between our desire for ease and our desire for effort, purpose, and productivity. The clouds represent paradise and ease while the bricks represent effort. In the left panel, the figure is dressed up as 'paradise' and is trying to manifest a perfect reality against her brick backdrop. In the right panel, she exists in paradise, but she's over it, taking out the trash and trying to get back to work.

This painting from my Rainbow Ribbon Magic series shows two figures whose bodies are close but not quite touching. Some ribbons flow over both of them, and some ribbons flow over one and under the other. This painting explores how even in our closest relationships, we are always our own unique person, and we can never truly share everything with another soul.

This painting is about a friend who suffered and survived ovarian cancer. I was in her yoga class when she described the moment she realized she needed to become her own light, and the image for this painting popped into my head. In her own words, "Do not fear a diagnosis,. It does not define you, it is not permanent. It is a flicker of a moment in your life when a hole had to be made for light to shine through, a way to expand your consciousness and human experience".

In the rainbow ribbon magic series, ribbons symbolize the energy and intention that propels from creators. In "Rhythm Prism", a singer is in the height of flow and the colorful ribbons are bursting from her microphone.

Guys and dolls tells the story of two figures who are technically together but existing on very different planes. The pink-lit female figure has an artificial doll-like presence and is enamored by her pink vinyl zebra balloon (symbolic of another caricatured and plasticised being). Her pink light is shining on the male figure, but he exists halfway between her world and his own blue light, where he is pining for a woman who is not quite there.

This painting from the dolls series is one of my earliest Electric Realism paintings. "Reflection" is the first self portrait I created upon returning from studying in Italy and discovering my "Electric Realism" style. During my travels, I became obsessed with the idea that people are constantly interacting with their environments, letting culture reflect onto them and imposing their beliefs and experience. I created this self portrait with a pink glint in my eye and pink glitter "reflecting" off of my hands as an exploration of the societal forces that are reflecting off of me.
